Councillor Carol Henshaw, Cabinet member for climate change at Preston City Council, said: "As a council, we're always looking for ways to further encourage householders to recycle as much of their waste as possible. Working in partnership with Alupro to deliver aluminium, we want them to go one step further and rinse these materials to minimise the risk of contamination. It's a simple job, but one that really benefits the environment!"

Tom Giddings, executive director of Alupro, added: "Initiatives such as our 'Clean Me' foil campaign are vital to our work in educating the public about best practice recycling. The great thing about aluminium is that it's infinitely recyclable – you can melt it down and reform it to create new products or packaging materials time and time again. By rinsing cans, tins and trays, you minimise the risk of food residue from contaminating recycling loads, so encouraging householders to do this is such a beneficial initiative."
